Often referred to as an investment superstar as well as a whiz at picking stocks, Eddie C. Brown heads Brown Capital Management, one of the most successful financial services firms in the United States. Brown began his company out of a home office several years ago, building a national reputation for his ability to pick stocks, and for his company philosophy of GARP; growth at a reasonable price.

When Brown was in school, he planned to attend college. He had excellent grades in high school, however, his teachers pushed vocational education classes instead of college preparatory courses. The young Brown insisted industrial arts courses would not get him where he wanted to be, and at sixteen he graduated from high school as one of the top students in his class.

Brown met and exceeded his goals, and after working for others became his own boss as head of a money management firm. Known for his successful and conservative securities management, he has appeared on national television, including as a panelist for more than 20 years on Wall Street Week with Louis Rukeyser, a Public Broadcasting System program. His firm manages a portfolio of more than $5.6 billion.

Brown still finds himself compelled to study potential investment markets and is well versed on each one he has considered. In his own estimation, Eddie C. Brown has done more than meet his own early goals for success. "It has been way above my wildest dreams," he told the Baltimore Sun.

Brown and his wife, C. Sylvia Brown, and their daughters, started the Brown Family Foundation in 1994 and are well known for their philanthropy in Maryland. Brown and his wife are avid cyclists and enjoy traveling.
